Games Vs. Homework

Faced with the choice between games and homework which do you pick? Would the option to play games absorb you, or would it be easy for you to decide that it is not the time for them? People struggle with finding a middle ground between games and homework daily, letting games take time that would otherwise be used for studying or homework.

New games are coming out left and right, making it harder than ever to stay on task at home. A few notable titles coming out soon are Assassin's Creed IV: Black Flag, Battlefield 4, Call of Duty Ghost, and Fifa 14. Right now the hot new game is the highly anticipated Grand Theft Auto V that was released just last week.

Just how popular is it? GTA has already made their money spent on developing the game back on Xbox pre orders alone and claimed the spot as the most expensive game ever made. According to Schmader, "What makes [GTA] great is that it is so immersive and they basically fixed everything that was wrong with all of the other GTA games, also the GTA V map is so huge. You could explore it for days."

Games are not evil but can sabotage your grades or social / sport life if you play them when they interfere with more important responsibilities. The key is to play them at the right time. Schmader said, "Some days I don't play at all and other days I go on a

While starting the article with a question is usually not encouraged, you definitely have the right gist as to what will grab readers' attention. If there is a way that you could make an introduction without posing a question, that'd be great.

said. "The idea is [that] can we trim the classes down to make it a more pleasant learning environment for students and teachers."

One by one students found other classes. Faro, a senior, has limited class selections. "It sucks because there aren't any classes for me to take, I have to make my own class as a CR [Community Resource]." And some students, who could take other classes, gave up their spot for another student because of how visibly upset they were.

"Kids gave up spots for others to stay, that was nice but it shouldn't have been necessary."

Comment 35°C

Hanna said. "I don't think it should have reached the point of pulling [redacted] allowed it in the first place."

The underlying question remains: If the students and teacher are okay with the number, then who cares?

"The board of administration care[s], the board of education, the superintendents care, some parents care about the district having 42 kids in a class." Hein said. "I'm fully committed to the teachers and I think they can handle larger class sizes."

Latin One, now 31 students, is preparing for a unit test. Latin One would be taking this test regardless of how many students had to take it. The only difference would be eleven more copies of the test. "I'm going to teach no matter what," McKnight said. "I'm really shocked with the number of kids that wanted to take Latin and I hope they will reconsider in the future."

Once a cheater, always a cheater?

Many question whether this type of behavior is one that will follow cheaters later on in life, or if it's purely impulsive. Lieberman thinks it's circumstantial. "It may be the beginning of a pattern that will last or endure into adulthood," she said. "I think it depends on why they're cheating to begin with. It's one thing if it's about trust. It could be the beginning of problems trusting somebody else."

Roberts argues that this type of behavior is not likely to repeat itself, because the infidelity doesn't always define the type of person they are. "The cheater is not necessarily a bad person," she said. "When someone cheats on somebody, it's because they're unhappy in their relationship; it's not just them."

She adds that there is often excessive blame put on the cheater, when the unhealthy relationship is what contributes to the behavior in the first place. "I think it's definitely a two way street," said Roberts. "Anybody under the right circumstances could end up being unfaithful."

Moving forward

Some wonder whether it is possible to move past the hurt and betrayal that cheating leaves in its path. Lieberman believes it is. "Sometimes forgiveness is just being able to talk through what happened, and why the other person did what they did," she said.

Some wonder whether it is possible to move past the hurt and betrayal that cheating leaves in its path. Lieberman believes it is. "Sometimes forgiveness is just being able to talk through what happened, and why the other person did what they did," she said.

For some, this has been easier than expected. Roberts believes that it was best for her to ignore the situation and move forward with her life. "I've tried to put the whole ordeal behind me," she said. "I think we're both more or less pretending it never happened."

But for Jones, her mistake has had a lasting effect. She believes that love and trust are not to be taken lightly, and that one exciting night is not worth the wreckage that faithlessness leaves behind. "When someone puts their trust in you, don't take advantage of that," she said. "Because it's a rare thing for someone to trust you completely. And it's a rare thing for someone to love you for who you are. I think I had that, and I let it go."

Such a great ending. Wonderful article. Only thing I'd add to the article is what exactly defines "cheating" and how it's different to different people. Do committed couples talk about it openly?/Is it fair to say someone has broken the "rules" if no rules and boundaries were established and talked about prior? I'd add that type of stuff, but it's not necessary. You have so many great sources and quotes. Awesome job.

First, I am so proud of your work on this edition. Go Communicator! Make sure that you get any pictures or pieces that you still need for print/web.

Print: We are looking to finish up pages on Thursday (fingers crossed).

My grades are up to date. Check them out. If you owe me work, get it to me asap. Your next article is due on Tuesday, October 15. If you turn it in late, it will be 50% credit. Don't go there. Start working now and make sure that all of your ducks (interviews) are in a row (done). Have a great weekend!
